Parque Warner Madrid is born from the ambition to bring the magic of cinema to the Spanish capital. The project was initiated in the early 2000s by Time Warner, which granted licenses to three major parks worldwide. Located 25 kilometers southeast of Madrid in San Martín de la Vega, the park opened its gates on April 5, 2002, in the presence of 10,000 distinguished guests. Celebrities such as Bo Derek and Christophe Lambert attended this historic event, marking the beginning of a new era for theme parks in Spain.

The initial management contract was signed with Six Flags, but the first years were marked by significant difficulties. Financial losses and operational issues led to a crisis that culminated in November 2004. The Community of Madrid, holding 40% of the shares, decided to terminate the management contract to stabilize the situation. This strategic move allowed the park to recover, with visitor numbers increasing and operating profits reaching approximately 2 million euros in the following season.

In 2006, the park underwent a rebranding, becoming Parque Warner Madrid to better reflect its identity. In 2007, Parques Reunidos took over management, bringing expertise and stability to the operation. This transition solidified the park's position as a leading destination for families and thrill-seekers alike. By August 7, 2010, the park celebrated its 10 millionth visitor, a symbolic milestone confirming its enduring appeal.

Recent years have seen the park evolve with new attractions and improvements. In May 2023, Batman Gotham City Escape opened, marking the first major new roller coaster since the park's inception. This modern addition has given the park a fresh impulse, attracting both loyal fans and new visitors. With 41 attractions across five themed zones, Parque Warner Madrid continues to innovate while honoring its cinematic heritage.
